Grads Fight Symbolic Tradition

BY ELIZABETH ELWART

The awakening of our present culture as we know it today began with the birth of the Greek academy. This was the beginning of formal education.

The mark of an educated person in the 1400's was a black flowing gown and a square cap. The robe and cap were worn by members of ecclesiastics, lawyers, and other high officials. This cap and gown was a symbol which won respect and esteem in the community.

Today a man's survival still depends on how educated he is.

This tradition of cap and gown has carried through present times where it is worn by each member of a graduating class. But like many traditions, the wearing of cap and gown is being re-examined by the youth of today, more specifically by DHS's graduating seniors.

Eighteen of DHS's graduating seniors aren't wearing caps and gowns this June. Their reasons didn't concern cap and gown itself, but as Mark Jansma stated, "It's the matter of following traditions blindly without thinking about why you're doing it."

Mark's parents feel the same way he does. "If a student doesn't want to participate in graduation, why should he be forced to? After all isn't it for the students?" questioned Mrs. Jansma.

Mr. Challis's answer to this refusal to wear a cap and gown was a note on the windows opposite the offices saying these 18 couldn't participate in either commencement or the honor assembly unless they had a cap and gown on.

When seniors were ordering caps and gowns no one warned of the consequences if they didn't wear one. Mr. Mazur, stated "Cap and gown is simply a tradition and there are not written laws concerning traditions."

Now all of a sudden the administration has said if a student doesn't wear a cap and gown they won't be able to participate in commencement and honor assembly.

If a student feels cap and gown is an honor and a necessary part of graduation, he should be able to wear a cap and gown. But in the same light the student who doesn't wish to wear a cap and gown and feels it's a useless tradition should be able to express and carry through these sentiments without being trounced by the administration.
